WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Republican presidential candidate Rick Santorum told donors on Thursday that he was concerned about a new front in the culture wars and that Republicans needed to appeal to "young, poor, and working class" voters. "We do need to be more compassionate, that is why we're called the party of compassion," Santorum told his donors at a breakfast meeting at the Ritz-Carlton hotel, according to a transcript of the event. "We have to be compassionate to the gay community, the traditional family, the pro-life community. We're compassionate, but I have never seen this party be compassionate to young, poor, and working class, and that's where I think we have to be," he said. Santorum was not specific about what he meant by "pro-life," referring only to his opposition to abortion. He said he was looking to broaden the party's base in states such as Indiana, North Carolina, Florida and Nevada where voters are "not necessarily Democrats, but they're becoming more and more independent." Santorum has made a strong anti-abortion stance the centerpiece of his campaign, and supporters say that has been a major factor in his strong showing in opinion polls. Asked about the availability of funds to finance his campaign, Santorum said he had "had an amazing amount of support, people have given me over $1 million so far." He criticized the fundraising practices of his two rivals. "I don't think it's right to be telling people we don't have the money to run a race when we're basically telling people we're on the ballot, we're not on the ballot but we're trying to get on the ballot," Santorum said.
